

REVIEW OF PAROLE HEARINGS: FISCAL YEAR 2020 (7/1/2019-6/30/2020)

When a parole client commits a new law violation or violates the conditions that were placed on their parole certificate, the Board of Parole holds a “review of parole” hearing. At these hearings, the Board reviews the laws violations or “technical violations” (violations of parole conditions that are not against the law) and determines whether the client should have their parole revoked or continued. The Board can make three possible decisions at this stage: (a) continue to allow the client stay on parole, possibly with additional conditions; (b) revoke the client’s current parole term but “reparole” that client with new conditions; or (c) revoke the client’s parole and return them to a Department of Corrections facility. Between July 2019 and June 2020, a total of 367 review of parole hearings were held. The data regarding review of parole hearings is captured below in the following graphs.

What are the Reasons for Revoking a Client’s Parole?

When the Board issues a decision to revoke parole for a client who is on supervision, that revocation is tied to violation of one or more terms of their parole. For any one review of parole hearing, a single or several violations of parole may be documented. The violations of parole that were documented in the 367 review of parole hearings held between July 2019 and June 2020 are listed below. Each violation category lists the total number of times that reason was cited (in parentheses behind the category) and is also broken down by whether that violation was associated with a client who was continued on parole (indicated in green) or whether the violation was associated with a client who had their parole revoked (indicated in black). It should be noted that financial violations are never a primary reason for revoking a client’s parole—or, in other words no client is ever revoked for financial violations only.
